Abstract

In January 2021, hospitals and payer-specific entities in the United States were mandated to comply with the new pricing transparency rules. These rules applied to all standard charges a hospital applied to services provided to and for a consumer. From a financial perspective, the issue of price transparency in health care has for several decades surfaced as a legitimate concern of consumers, health care providers and payers. The aim of this article is to historically examine where and how pricing in health care began and to illustrate financial issues leading up to the current transparency in pricing required by health care payers and providers. A comparative analysis of issues and challenges pertaining to the transparency in pharmaceutical product pricing between the United States and India is also provided in brief.

Abstract

The objective of this study is to provide a comparative analysis of the health financing systems in India and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia (KSA) across three major domains: resource mobilisation, pooling of resources and purchase of health services. This is an observational study using secondary data collected from international organisations, ministries of health and other government and non-government agencies in India and KSA. The study revealed that India has a very low expenditure on healthcare and markedly lower health outcomes compared to KSA. Although India's health financing system has undergone notable changes in the last two decades, it is lagging behind in many health financing system parameters. However, the share of government expenditure on current health expenditure has been increasing steadily with higher allocations to primary and secondary care. By expanding health insurance coverage and sustainable public health funding, it is likely that India will make significant progress towards achieving UHC.
